09 Comprensión auditiva - Conversación

Student: Professor Kim, do you have a moment? I wanted to talk about my grade on the last lab report.

Professor: Of course. What's your concern?

Student: Well, I put a lot of work into it, but I got a lower grade than I expected, and I'm not sure what went wrong.

Professor: Let me pull it up. Ah, yes. Your data collection and analysis were actually excellent - that part was among the best in the class.

Student: Oh, thank you. So where did I lose points?

Professor: Mainly in the discussion section. You reported your results clearly, but you didn't interpret them. A good discussion explains what the results mean, why they might have turned out that way, and how they connect to the theory we covered. You essentially repeated your numbers instead of explaining them.

Student: I see. I think I ran out of time and rushed that part.

Professor: That's a common mistake. My advice for next time: budget at least as much time for interpreting your results as you spend collecting them. The interpretation is where you show your understanding.

Student: That's really helpful. Would it be possible to revise it for partial credit?

Professor: I don't offer revisions for credit, but I'm happy to look over a rewritten discussion section and give you feedback, so you're stronger on the next report.

Good morning, and welcome to the campus recreation center. This is a brief announcement about our new membership system, which takes effect on the first of next month. Instead of paper membership cards, all students will now check in using the mobile app or their student ID card at the electronic scanners by the entrance. To use the app, download it from the recreation center's website and log in with your student account. Your membership is included in your student fees, so there is no additional charge.

Please note that the old paper cards will no longer be accepted after the end of this month. If you have any trouble setting up the app, staff at the front desk will be glad to help you during opening hours. We hope the new system makes checking in faster and more convenient for everyone. Thank you, and enjoy your workout.

Professor: Let's talk about a psychological phenomenon that shapes your daily life more than you probably realize: the power of habit. A surprisingly large portion of what we do each day isn't the result of conscious decisions - it's automatic behavior, driven by habit. And understanding how habits work gives us real power to change them. Psychologists describe a habit as a loop with three parts. First, there's a cue - a trigger that tells your brain to go into automatic mode. It might be a time of day, a location, an emotion, or the presence of certain people. Second, there's the routine - the behavior itself, which can be physical, mental, or emotional. And third, there's the reward - the benefit your brain gets, which teaches it that this loop is worth remembering. Over time, cue and reward become so linked that the routine happens almost automatically. Here's the crucial insight for changing habits: you generally can't just erase a bad habit. What works better is to keep the same cue and the same reward, but change the routine in between. Say you have a habit of eating a cookie every afternoon. The cue might be boredom around three p.m., and the reward might be a short break and a change of scenery - not actually the cookie itself. If you replace the routine - say, taking a two-minute walk instead - while keeping the same cue and reward, the new behavior can take hold. The reason this matters is that willpower alone is a weak tool for lasting change. People who rely on sheer willpower often fail, because habits are wired deep in the brain.

But people who understand the loop - who identify their cues and rewards and consciously redesign the routine - are far more successful. In a sense, you don't break a habit; you replace it.

20 Inscripción en una orquesta comunitaria

Student: I would like to join the community orchestra, but I have not performed in several years. Are auditions required?

Director: New members attend a placement session, not a competitive audition. We use a short piece to decide which part fits comfortably.

Student: Do I need to bring my own music stand?

Director: We provide stands and sheet music. Bring your instrument and arrive twenty minutes early to complete the membership form. The next placement session is Monday evening in the rehearsal hall.

21 Renovación de un casillero del centro recreativo

Announcer: Annual locker rentals at the recreation center expire at the end of this month. Current renters who want to keep the same locker must renew online by Tuesday. After that deadline, unrenewed lockers will be offered to students on the waiting list. Remove personal belongings by Friday if you are not renewing. Items left behind will be held at the service desk for fourteen days.

22 Surgencia costera

Professor: Coastal upwelling occurs when winds move surface water away from a coast and deeper water rises to replace it. The exact motion reflects Earth’s rotation and the relationship between wind and coastline, so wind does not simply push water straight ahead. What matters for our discussion is the resulting upward movement. Deep water is often colder and richer in nutrients than the sunlit surface water it replaces. When those nutrients reach the photic zone, phytoplankton can grow, supporting zooplankton, fish, seabirds, and marine mammals. This is why several major fishing regions occur near persistent upwelling systems. High productivity is a common outcome, not a guarantee of equal catches every year. Upwelling also changes temperature and chemistry near the coast. Its strength and timing vary with winds and larger climate patterns. If favorable winds weaken or shift, less nutrient-rich water may reach the surface. Extremely strong or prolonged upwelling can also bring low-oxygen or more acidic deep water into coastal habitats. Scientists monitor winds, sea-surface temperature, currents, oxygen, and biological indicators rather than using one measurement alone. Coastal upwelling illustrates how atmospheric motion can reorganize the ocean and influence an entire food web.
